Salves Can't Cure Eczema

In regard to skin diseases, medical authorities are now agreed on this: Don't impregnate the disease germs in your skin by the use of greasy salves, and thus encourage them to multiply. A true cure of all skin diseases can be brought about only by using the healing agents in the form of a liquid. WASH THIS ECZEMA OUT.

A simple wash. A compound of Oil of Wintergreen, Thymol, and other ingredients as combined in the D.I.X.D.

Prescription. This penetrates to the disease germs and destroys them, thus soothes and heals the skin as nothing else has ever done. A 25 cent trial bottle will start the cure and give you instant relief. We have made fast friends of more than one family by recommending this D.I.X.D. Prescription to a skin sufferer here and there, and we want you to try it now on our positive no pay guarantee.

FOSS WISHES NAME ON PRIMARY BALLOT

Washington, D. C., March 26.—Governor Foss, of Massachusetts, today notified representative Curley, of Massachusetts, that while he was not a candidate for president as announced last night, he desired that his name "appear as a preferential candidate to be voted on at the primaries in Massachusetts, April 30." Champ Clark accordingly declined to allow his name on the ballot there.

BORAH SAYS BOTH PARTIES FAIL TO DEFINE THE ISSUES AS OF OLD

Defends Primary System And Says It Would Prevent Corruption.

Washington, D. C., March 26.—Senator Borah of Idaho, one of the "Progressive" Republican leaders of the senate, speaking in that body today charged both of the great political parties with utter failure in their campaigns to give to the people clear and distinct issues, as of old. He contrasted present issues with those discussed by Lincoln and Douglass.

"We awake each morning to a saturnalia of personal drive, to tickings and quarrels which have all the flavor of discussions carried on in the political groggeries of the lowest dives in the most rotten districts of our great cities," said senator Borah. "One week our great dailies are teeming with the difference between Wilson and Harvey, the next week with what Col. Roosevelt said to some personal friend in Oyster Bay, the next week how the president failed to appreciate the worth of some Rough Rider and thereby changed the current of history."

"If we could know the withering contempt and bitter scorn which the earnest and industrious people of this country really have for this cowardly abandonment of the great issues, for this betrayal of the destinies of a great party, some heroic effort would certainly be made to get away from the most shameful and disgraceful contention that ever embarrassed a great cause. Turn back and read the great debates of Lincoln and Douglass when those intellectual giants fought for supremacy in the senate and house joint committee of the judiciary committee, the postponement of action on the proposed workmen's compensation bill."

The house met at noon and began consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. The Florida Everglades land investigation was continued, and editor Arnold of the Agricultural department, said his department did not put its "O. K." on any report on the Everglades.

THE EAVESDROPPER.
By L. G. Morebly.
"DID YOU remember?" she said. The voice that spoke the words was so tremulous, so sweet, that I pulled myself up by the trunk of the pine tree against which I leaned and tried to get a glimpse of the speaker. The drowsy warmth of the July afternoon had made me drowsy, too. Even on those uplands, among the heather and the pines, no breeze was stirring, and a haze of heat lay over the blue landscape that spread into infinity beyond the purple moorland. I was very tired. I had sat down upon the heather to rest awhile, leaning against a pine tree trunk, and I must have fallen asleep, and been sleeping for some time, for I had heard to my astonishment, as I awoke, the sound of a voice, and I was roused from my slumbers.

"Do you remember?" she said. Behind my pine tree the ground sloped abruptly to a little terrace among the heather, and a seat had been placed, and peering round the tree trunk, I could see that since my own arrival upon the scene an old gentleman and lady had come to the seat, and were sitting now, facing the wide outlook over the sea of heather to the blue hills in the distance. Nothing could have been further from my thoughts than any idea of eavesdropping—but I had become an unconscious eavesdropper, and as I sat there, I decided that I had better remain there quietly, without making my presence known.

It was Sunday afternoon, and across the valley came a turmoil of sweet bells. Their music must have been some echoing memories in the old lady's heart, for her gentle voice spoke again.

"The bells rang that afternoon, dear—the afternoon in May when I came down the church path and met you and your mother. Do you remember? I could not look up into your face because I dared not meet your eyes. I looked across the lane to the hazel coppice and then I looked down at your hand that still held mine. And then—then I understood all the wonderful beauty of all the world when your hand held mine that day."

Then—ah! you do remember, Michael. I do not think you have forgotten one moment of that day. I think we have both remembered. Then you bent over me. You were always so kind to me. I was such a slip of a girl—and you had to bend so far to look into my eyes, that did not dare lift themselves to yours. But when you bent to look into them, all that your eyes said, set me shivering with joy—and my pulses leapt and leapt, and I tried to draw it away, whispering that I was a girl—and young—and all the universe had changed for me that day; and I knew—oh, how I knew—that I had never known before.

"And then?" he said again in his gruff voice, that yet brought a smile to the sweet old face. "Then you drew me nearer to you, Michael, and you kissed my face, and you kissed my lips. No, no, no, I never kissed my lips before—and I did not know till then—I did not know that it would open the gates of Paradise."

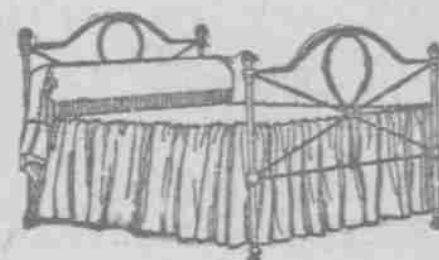

No answer came in words from the old man by her side, and there was a long silence. I leaned forward and a little to look again at the old couple on the bench below me. The sunlight touched the old lady's face and it lit into actual beauty. I thought it was easy to picture what her face must have been when she was a slip of a girl—easy to understand why the tall Michael had learnt to love her, and why he had wished to kiss her lips. But I found myself wondering what it was in him that had opened the gates of Paradise for her; why the deep, gruff-toned voice that spoke power over her, and that taught her to love him with so great a love.

From where I sat he looked an ordinary enough man. What was there in him, I reflected, that inspired his sweet old wife with the enduring love that made her voice so tremulous, her eyes and smile so sweet. "Do you remember?" she said once more. And as she spoke he turned fully and looked at her. And when I saw the smile that lit the ruggedness of his face, when I saw that tenderness that shone out of them; when I saw these things—I knew.

thing in it which stirred my pulses strangely. "When I knew that you loved me—and the world was changed," she said.

He laughed, a short, gruff laugh, but he seemed to be in it, and he went on speaking—quite placidly—quietly.

"There was a thrush that sang in the Hawthorn tree—and when you took my hand, I knew all at once what was the meaning of his song. There was a new glory in the sunshine and in the leaves that whispered overhead; I understood all the wonderful beauty of all the world when your hand held mine that day."

The silence that followed her words, the turmoil of sweet bells fell softly across the valley again; the song of the lark drifted down to us from the blue above our heads; a breeze crept drowsily as he flew among the heather flowers; a little breeze sang in the highest boughs of the pine-trees. "Do you remember?" she said, "you did not speak—you did not speak a word—you only held my hand—and I knew all that you meant to say—and my heart was so full, and I was so glad, and you would hear its beating, and I could not look up into your face because I dared not meet your eyes. I looked across the lane to the hazel coppice and then I looked down at your hand that still held mine.
